KNOW THE WEATHER

By E. H. Sims

Is fog generally more prevalent on the west coast than on the east coast?

Yes, fog is more prevalent on the west coast. The reasons lies in the coditions which must exist for the creation of fog. The first requirement is moist air. The second is that a cooling of the air must take place.

The prevailing direction of the weather fronts and air masses across the United States is west to east. Therefore, the air masses from the Pacific strike the west coast as moist air masses having traveled over miles of water.

When these moist air masses are cooled fog can readily result. On the east coast, on the contrary, dry air masses (from over land) move eastward, out and over the water and often break up conditions which would create fog.
